

There are so many ways to advertise. There should be no need for companies to hire individuals to make disrupting and often times disturbing advertising/marketing calls. It is very frustrating when your personal time is interrupted, and I consider advertising phone calls a form of harassment. In my opinion, people have every right to block out these sales calls. By doing away with the "Do Not Call List" a negative message is being sent to the public. This message is indicative of the greater importance of companies (who have many other means of advertising as stated earlier), rather than families and the average American. Crank calls are not tolerated because they are uninvited and unwanted. The people who have applied their name to the aforementioned list feel the identical way about telemarketing calls. Do you want the public to feel harrassed and undermined?
